

The Welsh Marches

a preliminary discussion document inviting comments

The borderlands between England and Wales are where the Romans finally defeated Caratacus in AD 51. Cassius Dio and Tacitus described how Caratacus started out as a ruler of east-central England based in Camulodunum (Colchester) but ended up as a guerrilla leader supported by the Silures and Ordovices peoples in Wales. Evidently Caratacus could speak the languages of east and west Britain as well as Latin.

The key battle has never been definitely located, but the analysis by Burn (1950) (available online) seems pretty convincing. Burn focussed on an area south of Shrewsbury, near the Welsh border, where the Roman base at Viroconium was 16 km inside England, like “a pistol pointed at the heart of Wales”. Caratacus put a fortified outpost on Caer Caradoc at SO476952, near modern Church Stretton, Shropshire, about 26 km in advance of his headquarters in another hillfort also called Caer Caradoc at SO310758, north of Knighton, Powys. The Romans quickly overran the forward hillfort, and then marched towards the home base of Caratacus who tried to stop them in a proper battle at a defensive line on the southern side of the river Clun, somewhere near SO366796 and a place now called Twitchen.

After that, the Romans captured Caratacus' wife and daughter, but the man himself escaped, only for Cartimandua to turn him over to the Romans, who paraded him in triumph at Rome but did not execute him. The Romans' flexible, even tender, treatment of some defeated enemies contrasts strangely with their brutality in other areas (the arena, in battle, and in family strife).

All this matters because the place name Argistillum evokes the Roman practice of carting off enemy children to be educated and acculturated in Rome. Our modern word guest is confusingly close to old words for ‘hostage’, such as Old English gisel. Where, and under what conditions, did Caratacus' relatives live after the Roman victory? Would it be a speculation too far to suggest that his wife was a Welsh princess whom the Romans left in place to help maintain peace in mid-Wales and the borders?

Let's look at the sequence of place names in this area supplied by the Ravenna Cosmography, which seems to be reporting names from a relatively early, and very military perspective.

Magnis is generally identified with Kenchester. That name, also shared with the Hadrian's Wall fort of Carvoran, has no clear explanation – possibly some sort of headquarters.

Branogenium could mean ‘river source(s)’ and therefore be in the headwaters of the Severn, at or near Caersws. Medieval Welsh poetry makes much of Brân the Blessed, allegedly the father of Caradawg who was sent to Rome as a hostage for seven years (AD 51 to 58), where he became a Christian and brought the faith to Britain when he returned. This story is most likely to be imaginative fiction woven around an old place name, but maybe some real recollection of Roman times did persist.

Epocessa and Ypocessa plainly fit Thucydides' sense of ‘outpost for offensive operations’. This does not instantly suggest locations, but they probably occupied good farmland.

Macatonion looks very Greek, based on μαχαιον ‘wish to fight’ from a PIE root that led to the word Amazon. Maybe this name applies to one of Caratacus' bases, or to the key battle site.

Glebon Colonia was almost certainly modern Gloucester, but, that makes the Cosmography's track across the map messy: darting from mid-Wales down south-east to Gloucester and then back to mid-Wales. Something is wrong. Was the Cosmographer's track sometimes indeed messy, or have we placed some names wrongly?

Argistillum appears to mean ‘noble hostage place’. If there is any merit in the idea of Caratacus’ wife as the Romans’ puppet ruler, where might she be based? Some relatively grand, but not militarily defensible, hillfort near a Roman base is the obvious guess. Later Welsh Arwystli is uncomfortably far west.

Vertis is unlocated, though Worcester is a possibility.

Salinis probably meant the salt springs at Droitwich.

In allocating names to places our analysis of potential locations is only preliminary and needs improvement. Maybe a local historian, retired intellectual, or young student can do better. That will require reading about everything that archaeology can contribute about this area.

Near Viroconium the Romans built a fort at Leighton, and then to the south-south-west were forts at Stretford Bridge and Brandon Camp. Further in that direction was a fort at Walton. To the south-west, several forts were built at Caersws (sometimes described as Llwynnybrain). To the west were Llansantffraid-ym-Mechain and Abertanat. In addition, temporary camps probably used in the mid-Wales campaign stretch from Viroconium past Upper Affcot, Bromfield, Walford, Brampton Bryan, and Walton, to the fort at Clyro. And the fort at Leintwardine shows up as Bravonio in the Antonine Itinerary.

Bright ideas please!
